I've been using Photoshop for 15 years. I originally used it simply to edit my images but quickly realized I could achieve just as much using Photoshop for web development. The older versions of Photoshop were a nightmare for web developers but the new versions are amazing! It's been a long time coming for this review to finally be unveiled--over 6 months of work. I have had Photoshop on my Photoshop.org site for 6 months, and I've had Lightroom on it for nearly 3 years. Since Elements is the base of both of these Photoshop tools, that's where I started as well. I am well aware of the fact that most CS6 users are now using Elements since it is by far the most popular tool. The central focus of this review will be to go into detail on the new features that have been added to Lightroom 5 in an effort to show the extent from which this tool is enhanced. For those that are new to the series, it is the Photoshop blog/website that Martin Parr and I (as well as others) run. Going forward, we will be reviewing the latest releases of Photoshop and Lightroom on this site. One of the main focuses of this review is the provision of working tools for creating a reference library. For those that don't know, a reference library is a collection of step-by-step instructions to help you complete a task. In older versions of Lightroom, Apple showed you the image you were working on, along with a panel of tools that you could select which will display your choice of a grid of instructions. Not many people used those panels, and for the most part, I didn't bother to use them.
